Inside a secluded house a mysterious ceremony takes place. A ritual of the black mass, worshippers of the devil. Suddenly the group is set upon by Irenius Daninsky, Inquisitor under the regime of Wladislaw III. All are taken away and condemned to death by fire. The last victim places a malediction upon his executioner. Condemning him and his descendants to eternal death in life. 400 years pass. During a hunt, one such descendant (Waldemar) accidentally kills a young gypsy.

That night, in the gypsy camp, the gypsies call upon Satan to fulfill the malediction. The Devil takes possession of Maria, the most seductive of the gypsy girls. She searches out the young hunter, seduces him and at the climax of their lovemaking marks him with "Satan's teeth", the teeth marks of the Werewolf. Waldemar himself is turned into a Werewolf, seeking victims to satisfy his thirst, possessed with the fire that can only be quenched with the taste of Blood. A fiend that roves through the country leaving death and destruction in its wake.

Waldemar, at first unaware of his double identity, joins in the hunt of the killer. But as more and more full moons pass he awakens to the truth. Sick at heart but unable to stop. Kinga, Waldemars fiancée, begins to suspect and so do the villagers. After a long chase the Werewolf is cornered and Kinga drives a silver cross into his heart. Death at the hand of his true love at last frees him from the curse. But a son is born to Kinga. Will he have the same fate as his father Waldemar?
